Table of contents

Table of contents ................................................................................................... | i
Preface .................................................................................................................. | v
INTRODUCTION ..................................................................................................... | 1

CHAPTER ONE

The concept of language as action in retrospect ........................................ 3
1.1. Introduction .................................................................................................. | 3
1.2. Religious, magic, ritual, and institutional performative utterances of the past and in ethnolinguistics ................................................................. | 5
1.3. Aristotle and the later philosophical-linguistic perspective ...................... | 7
   1.3.1. Aristotle and antiquity ............................................................................. | 7
   1.3.2. The Kantian perspective .......................................................................... | 9
   1.3.3. Reid and the concept of ‘social operations’ ........................................... | 11
   1.3.4. Frege’s concept of ‘force’ ...................................................................... | 12
1.4. Wittgenstein and the concept of a language game .................................... | 14
   1.4.1. The concept of ‘meaning as use’: Wittgenstein, his contemporaries and further elaborations ................................................................. | 14
   1.4.2. Wittgenstein and the concept of a language game and ‘family resemblance’ ................................................................. | 17
1.5. Husserl and the phenomenologist perspective ......................................... | 19
   1.5.1. Brentano’s physical and psychological phenomena .............................. | 19
   1.5.2. Edmund Husserl and mental activities ................................................... | 20
   1.5.3. Anton Marty ........................................................................................... | 22
1.6. Reinach’s ‘sociale Akte’ in language and law and the beginning of speech act theory in Germany ................................................................. | 22
1.7. Research into functions of language in the linguistics tradition .......... | 24
3.2. Speech acts and speech act verbs – between the emic and etic approaches to classificatory criteria .................................................................114
3.3. Austin’s taxonomy .................................................................125
3.4. Selected classifications of speech acts and speech act verbs beyond Austin .
3.4.1. Searle’s modification of Austin’s taxonomy .......................130
3.4.2. Classifications of speech acts and speech act verbs beyond Austin’s and Searle’s models .................................................................139
3.5. Indirect acts and classificatory criteria ....................................158
3.6. Speech act categories in an intercultural perspective ...............160
3.7. The act of promising – a ‘zooming’ perspective .....................165
3.8. Speech acts and their classifications in a diachronic perspective ....181
3.9. Preliminary conclusions ........................................................183

CHAPTER FOUR
Speech acts and the notion of convention ........................................187
4.1. Introduction ...........................................................................187
4.2. The concept of convention in linguistics and philosophy ...........189
4.3. Convention and intention in the context of speech act theory .........198
4.3.1. Austin on convention in speech acts ....................................199
4.3.2. Strawson, conventionality of linguistic acts and Gricean intervention205
4.3.3. Searle on convention and intention in speech acts ..................209
4.3.4. Morgan on conventions and speech acts ...............................213
4.3.5. Selected cognitive approaches including Bach and Harnish (1979) and Levinson (2000) .....................................................................217
4.3.6. Millikan’s biological model of language and conventions .........220
4.3.7. Brandom and linguistic conventions in a normative perspective ....232
4.3.8. (Preliminary) Classification of intentionalis and conventionalists ...234
4.3.9. Convention, semantic minimalism, contextualism, and short-circuited meanings .............................................................................238
4.3.10. Convention and iterability – Derrida and his legacy ...............246
4.4. Preliminary conclusions ........................................................248